TEENAGE LIFE

Boys

Dan is 17 years old. He plays in a band called Brokers. He's been friends with Andy since 17. Andy says that the band is going to be successful. Andy is a year younger than Dan. In his free time, he says, he likes to do anything for fun. Kevin, 17, was at his part-time job yesterday at Cash Generation, an electrical store. They all live in a small town in Kansas.

All four are big music fans. "I hate Eminem, though," says Andy. "I just don't believe in Eminem. He's a bad boy on stage at his concerts, but really he's just a little kid in glasses."

The boys all go to the local high school, which has its own internet cafe. But they don't seem interested in computers. "I want a music and go to club nights when I'm at home," Luke says. "But there's this group of nerds at school who are interested by Bill Gates. I'm not like that."

The boys spend their spare time at a local coffee shop, although they don't spend much money there. "We don't get any hassle," Dan says. "The people who run the coffee shop are friendly, and they don't care much about money."

"Sometimes we'll go in for a coffee and a game of pool," Dan explains. "Sometimes I go after work on Sundays just to watch the sports highlights on TV. Our parents don't mind where we go. I have my cellphone, so when it gets really late, my mom calls me."

Surprisingly, the boys don't complain about their parents. "Generally, I think our parents understand the difference between their lives when they were teenagers and ours," Dan says. "That's one of the main reasons we get along OK."

"They want us to do better than they did," Luke says. "They want us to go to college. We have more choices than our parents had."
